(No)NCUR reflection

1. This virus going around has been absolutely wild. I was blissfully ignoring it until the Wednesday before Spring break. Then it started going south fast. I honestly am not incredibly worried about the virus, which is weird given my history of anxiety, but hey, God has been working on that in my life and perhaps this is testing me. It is very difficult remaining a student at this time. While I have an apartment in Bozeman, I am in Helena with my family. The dynamic of my family and home makes it a very difficult environment to study and do homework in. It is also hard to keep track of some of the due dates for quizzes and homeworks for some of my classes. My easiest class this semester is an already online class with Daniel Koltz, and I thought the class would be unaffected, but he decided to get rid of a few assignments, so now that class is even easier, so that is good. But now it competes for attention with all of my classes being online. I am just very confused.
2. In this day and age with so much technology, I would hope to move everything I can to online. I would hope to do personal meetings over the internet rather than just assign work. I would want to help my students establish a routine, because I know that is one of the most difficult things for me keeping me from doing work.
3. I could potentially benefit from a little bit of grace on due dates. Not too much that I would begin to abuse it, but if something is due at say 10am, it could be turned in by 11am without penalty, or something like that. Continual communication and reminders for each assignment would be very helpful. I am just pretty overwhelmed with it all and I am not quite sure what I need.

Thank you for asking us these things and keeping up with us. I will miss your class so much!
